and is, therefore, approached in the thesis as being characterised by constant changes. These changes have been contingent mainly on social-political considerations, but also on the response of artists to the political constraints imposed upon them.

Art and Politics in China, 1949-1986

The central argument submitted in the thesis is that art in the People's Republic of China should be seen as an image of social reality. The argument is pursued by a method which seeks to relate art to social-political settings, (Beim. 21s.) China. By Reno Grousset. (Hamish Hamilton. 25s.) THESE two books bear the same title, but there is little else in common between them, apart from the fact that each of their authors is, in his own sphere, an authority on Chinese life and thought. The earlier part of Mr. Lyall's book is historical and descriptive. It is somewhat overburdened with quotations, some of them extending over
