Most new cars use iridium or titanium spark plugs, which can sometimes last up to 100,000 miles, let alone 90,000. But be careful: Cheaper spark plugs, made of copper, are still in use and typically need to be replaced by 30,000 miles. Timing Belt Cars that use a timing belt rather than a timing chain need to worry about this bit of maintenance. We recommend changing your belt pre-emptively between 75,000 and 90,000 miles, as a belt failure can lead to catastrophic damage (and leave you ...

The way to keep that reliability is to do the regular, scheduled maintenance for the car. The owner's manual for most cars has specifics for the vehicle in question, but as a general rule, knowing the service intervals for most vehicles helps at least keep your calendar updated, especially in multi-car households.
