Khoekhoe - Wikipedia

Prior to the arrival of European settlers in the 15th century the economy of what was to become South Africa was dominated by subsistence agriculture and hunting. In the north, central and east of the country tribes of Bantu peoples occupied land on a communal basis under tribal chiefdoms. It was an overwhelmingly pastoral economy and wealth was measured in the number of cattle men held. Population growth had created a land pressure that had seen the tribes move steadily from the origins in cent

The Khoikhoi practiced Iron working and pottery making. The San did not have these skills. They carried out barter trade with the Bantu and later with the Europeans, for instance the Dutch and Portuguese. They exchanged cattle and other related products for European goods like brass, copper, beads, cloth and porcelain, among others.

How the Khoikhoi society was organized Political Organization

The ritual and festive activity which took place when a child was born often recurred in other Khoikhoi rituals. Prior to delivery, the mother to be was taken to a hut where she remained for at least seven days after delivery. Both she and the child were seen to be vulnerable and so certain avoidances were practised.

The Khoikhoi and the San

Though they both had chiefs, the San chiefs' role had little powers, but the Khoikhoi chiefs, to a very smaller extent had powers to convict and punish an offender or criminal. Whereas the San depended largely on hunting and raids, the Khoikhoi cultivated a few crops, domesticated sheep and cattle.
