I will never be beautiful. All my flaws mask anything good in me. No one really loves me. I'm even ugly on the inside. There's nothing good I have to offer to me or anyone else. I'm the scum on the ground no one notices. Haven't we all felt the wicked feeling of being ugly. From the inside out, our beauty is turned into disgrace.

I will never have someone find me beautiful, even if I do ascend, and I know this to be 100% true. I will never live that life that people are blessed with merely by existing where everything is virtually handed to them on a silver platter for their very existence. I will never be able to look in the mirror, and be proud of what I see.

If you are looking for a book of poems to take to the beach, i will never be beautiful enough to make us beautiful together is one to consider. Its mint-green and pale-gray cover even looks like a day at the ocean in early summer—cool and brisk and fresh. But if the contents of this book are a visit to the beach, it's not a boardwalk with ice cream shops and Victorian facades—it's an ill-advised, itchy kegger on the sand, and waking up to a smudged sky, tangled with a stranger.
