Well, almost all front-end tooling is built in Node.js. Calypso is built with popular node tools like WebPack, Babel, Jade, Uglify, Hot Loader, Marked and over 100 other modules. This is how the front end space is evolving and frankly I'm glad to see WordPress start using them because its one space we don't see a lot of people using these tools.

Reverse proxy works fine, but in the long run it would be great if node had a solid FastCGI module. Needing to throw another webserver into your stack is a sign of immaturity in the platform, IMHO. If we had FastCGI, you could run php with FPM, and use node to spin up and manage your php workers when you spin up your node server.
