'The Architecture of the City' was firstly published in 1966 by Aldo Rossi, based on his notes and lectures, when functionalism predominated. As Rossi stated, this book did not cover new issues, but it was sensational for architects in that era because it gave them a chance to rethink architecture with respect to the city as a meaning of collective life, history, and reality instead of from a functional aspect.

"I do not invent, I remember" (Aldo Rossi) The origins of Aldo Rossi's architecture dates back to the lectures that Ernesto Nathan Rogers used to do at the Politecnico di Milano, in the end of the 1950, in these circumstances it is possible to place Aldo Rossi inside the so called "Scuola di Milano". The main points that characterize that movement are: Roger's teaching, the distance from the rigidity of the modern movement, an architecture more open to the complexity of the reality.

The locus, for Rossi, becomes the primary attribute of the city of collective memory. Rossi writes: Thus we consider locus the characteristic principle of urban artifacts; the concepts of locus, architecture, permanences, and history together help us to understand the complexity of urban artifacts. The collective memory participates in the actual transformation of space in the works of the collective, a transformation that is always conditioned by whatever material realities oppose it.
