So Tolkien shelved Roverandom even though he had revised it repeatedly and made lovely illustrations for it, and wrote The Lord of the Rings instead. This story began, like The Hobbit, as something Tolkien made up for his children. His second son, Michael, lost a little toy dog that he loved dearly while they were at the beach, and Tolkien made up a whole series of adventures for the dog to help his son process the loss.

J.R.R.Tolkien was a prolific storyteller to his children, though few of his early stories survive. Roverandom was a particular favourite, so much so that Tolkien wrote it out and even illustrated it himself. But for over 70 years it has remained unpublished.

Roverandom, along with Letters from Father Christmas, are stories Tolkien wrote for his children, which I think is an awesome thing to do. But Roverandom goes beyond being simple and shallow and has a lot of content that stretches the minds and abilities of children and provides entertainment for adults at the same time.
