I came to Shatterday on the back of Ellison's stellar reputation, and left with my hopes and illusions dispelled. Having heard him described as a visceral and painfully honest genre-disregarding examiner of the darkest recesses of the human condition, I was expecting something like William Burroughs on steroids (rather than heroin).

Harlan Ellison is a confounding kind of guy, and he writes confounding stories. By turns brilliant, sappy, bitter and loving, these short examples of his work illustrate the man - as best we can tell - and serve as a good introduction to his work for those who haven't read him before. For those who have, they're a good reminder of how maddening ...

COMMENTARY. All the stories in Shatterday were written between 1977 and 1980; with the exception of the cover story (1975) and "Would You Do It for a Penny" (1967). Ellison, in his introduction, writes that all of these stories are about mortal dreads - the darkneses and the fears that feed upon our soul; the whispers we think no one else can hear.
