Reproduction of a Georgian Kissing Bough hung in the kitchen of Fairfax House in York As time went on, however, something changed. The kisses exchanged beneath such boughs took on new meaning, so that by Austen's day, the Kissing Bough offered a socially acceptable excuse for young couples to engage in flirtation.

Christmas Kisses: The Kissing Bough in Jane Austen's England

The kissing bough was one of the most popular Christmas decorations in Tudor times. Similar to wreaths, Tudor Christmas boughs were woven from ash or willow wood and then covered in evergreen foliage. They were often hung on walls or over doorways as a gesture of goodwill to welcome guests into the home.
