Narrow your eyes, harden your heart, and examine your advertising as a skeptical consumer would. Does it answer these two questions? "Why is your product better than the others?" "Why should I buy it?" After 25 years of launching and sustaining brands, Robin Woods knows that brand marketing can't succeed without the WIFM ("What's in it for me?"). In this savvy and sensible book - begun as a memo to a client who was locked into old ideas - the author invites you to forge a marketer-customer partnership, marked by a refreshing respect for the buyer's intelligence. What's in it for me? propels brand marketing beyond the limits of the Unique Selling Proposition, "brand character," badge theory, and other such strategies. Before concentrating on the distinctiveness of the brand, advises Woods, you must focus on consumers' needs. Basic knowledge? Don't be so sure. Four out of five ads fail to meet this prerequisite. Yet "needs are everywhere," as the author says, and he shows how to identify them in relation to the uniqueness of your product - whether you sell cat litter, cars, or even "image" items like bottled water. What's in it for me? sets advertisers straight on another common pitfall: It spells out the critical differences between product category, brand, and company image - and shows how to exploit the WIFM in each, "Confusion on this subject is the single largest contributor to the mispositioning of so many of today's brands," Woods warns. His guidance will rescue you from the money pit of so-called life-style ads, most of which harm rather than enhance brand personality. It will also help you build and maintain brand loyalty. To help you sniff out WIFMs (or the lack of them) in actual practice, this book includes 30 reproductions of ads from such giants as Ajax, Jif, Volvo, Miracle Whip, and Saran Wrap. What's in it for me? provides page after page of uncommon sense for everyone who needs to make his or her marketing dollars pay off. Whether you're a brand manager ... a client seeking more focused work from your agency ... an account executive seeking better brand positioning for your client ... or a senior executive in search of smarter strategies and a brighter bottom line ... What's in it for me? has a wealth of ideas in it for you.
