We Who Are About To, released in 1977, is a clear-eyed, bleak excoriation of the interpenetration of masculinity, colonialism, and death. The short novel is about eight people—five women and three men—whose spaceship has gone off course and dropped them on a distant, unknown, semi-hospitable planet.

"We Who Are About To is a seminal work that punctures many science fiction myths; it is about the hubris of humanity and the imperialist mission. It reminds us that maybe we aren't necessary, that the imperative to keep reproducing is irrational." ?Farah Mendlesohn, editor of Foundation: The International Review of Science Fiction

5/5 (Masterpiece: caveats below) We Who Are About To... (1976) is the third of Joanna Russ' science fiction novels I've read over the past few years. For some reason I was unable to gather the courage to review The Female Man (1975) and might have been too enthusiastic about And Chaos Died (1970). We Who Are About To... is superior to both (although, not as historically important for the genre as The Female Man).

Joanna Russ' classic 1977 sci-fi novella, We Who Are About To... explores just that question. A small group of space travelers finds themselves stranded on a strange, uninhabited planet, cosmically far from any approximation of civilization. The air is breathable, the gravity is normal, there is running water; the final pillar of life, however, is missing: there's no food.

Hail Caesar, we who are about to die salute you! And die the gladiators did. In a vast marble Colosseum larger than the Yankee Stadium, the people of Rome, patrician and commoner, flocked to see gladiators mangled beneath the hoofs and wheels of horses and chariots, slaughtered by half-starved wild beasts and butchered by well-armed and armoured professionals.

Even if it's not as insidious as the great masculine traditions of literature, it's far more blatant and clumsy, and We Who Are About To... is the equally blatant response. But only in the first half. The second half is a reflexive analysis of what it means to be that agent of reaction and militancy, the one who snaps and kills everyone.
